About the Seminar : The global shift toward sustainability demands a transformative approach where Environment, Health, and Safety (EHS) play a central role in guiding industries, institutions, and communities towards responsible growth. Green transitions are not merely about adopting cleaner technologies or renewable energy - they involve redesigning systems to ensure environmental integrity, human well-being, and workplace safety that coexist with economic progress. Understanding the EHS dimensions of green transitions is crucial for postgraduate students and researchers. They represent the next generation of environmental leaders, scientists, and policy professionals who will shape sustainable industrial practices, develop innovative green technologies, and influence compliance frameworks. By integrating EHS principles into research and professional practice, they can bridge the gap between theory and real-world implementation — ensuring that sustainability is achieved without compromising health and safety standards. This seminar aims to provide a platform for emerging environmentalists to engage with experts, explore current trends in EHS management, and identify interdisciplinary research opportunities that contribute to a resilient and sustainable future.
